

Gender as a social determinant affects to a high extent our health and the health care system. It not only influences health-related behaviours, help seeking and the utilization of health care services, but also access to prevention, treatment and care. Furthermore, gender-related inequalities and stereotypic gender beliefs are observed in practice of health care providers, that is, within health care systems. This workshop presents and discusses three studies addressing gender in access to health care and in provision of health care.
