[anthro]metronom

blog for psychological anthropology, psychology and activism

“How can equality be one of the most important European values, if everything is built on inequality?”

from Racism in Psychiatry: A Postcolonial Aftermath? On Proximity and Distance of Psychiatry and Anthropology
by Saskia Sturm

[anthro]metronom

publishes essays on psychological anthropology accessible to everyone. It is designed as a platform where students, scholars, and activists are invited to submit essays related to current or historical discussions at the intersections of anthropology, psychology, and psychiatry. The blog discusses a wide range of topics: from suffering and mental health to therapies and healing, emotions and affects; from critical reflections on psychiatric practices to discussions of the concepts of self, personhood, and culture, or the coming of age of children and adolescents. It maintains a focus on cultural, structural and political dimensions as they influence human experience, well-being, and suffering. The blog is organised by graduate students at the Institute of Social and Cultural Anthropology at Freie Universität Berlin and supervised by Thomas Stodulka.

Follow us ig: @anthrometronom fb and x: @AnthroMetronom bsky: @anthrometronom.bsky.social